Read the text then do the following activities:

For years, many students who choose literary classes in high school set their heart on joining the foreign language class later. It is widely believed that they did this to avoid having philosophy as a core subject for the years to come. To find out whether that thought was true or false, I decided to conduct a survey. (§1)

I questioned a hundred pupils of the first year classes in order to know why they all aspired to become foreign language learners. When I asked them if they were into languages, the majority said they were interested in learning them. Then I asked them which language they preferred learning. Some of them enjoyed learning French, while others were passionate about English. Only a handful were equally enthusiastic about both. However, my main interest was why they wished to join a language class later. Most of them told me that they loved studying languages and planned to further a career in the field, but very few declared that they did not wish to study philosophy as the most important subject. When I wanted to know whether they intended to study languages at university, most of them revealed that they would do once they passed their BAC exam with distinction. (§2)

Surprisingly, my research showed that the common belief proved to be wrong, as the majority want to switch to language classes out of genuine interest rather than a desire to escape philosophy. (§3)
