A/Comprehension (7pts)

Fake goods are often tempting as they cost less than the real thing, but they are inferior in quality and may be unsafe and dangerous. Of course, they also don't come with any after-sales service or guarantees. The fake products are often poorly made, do not comply with safety standards and could be potentially lethal.

It might seem like the fake goods industry is victimless and a harmless activity but serious organised crime gangs monopolise the trade in counterfeit goods. In other words, if you buy a fake designer bag or knock-off sunglasses, it is the final link in a chain that profits criminals who can be involved in extortion, people-smuggling and even drug trafficking. And these criminal enterprises are going to make the product as quickly and cheaply as they can, with low quality and potentially dangerous materials and ingredients. They really don't care about the after-effects they are just interested in maximising their profits.

The majority of counterfeit items come from factories in the Far East, 'staffed' by children who are paid very little, have no labour rights and work up to 18 hours a day. As the industry is driven by the consumers growing desires, so does the amount of sweat shops producing these products.

Counterfeit items also have a very damaging effect on the economy. Through this, manufacturing and retail jobs are lost because legitimate companies cannot compete with people selling on the street and online at cheap prices. In turn, this leads to a loss of reinvestment and innovation. Thus, the counterfeit market reduces the visibility of luxury brands. If you discover counterfeit products, you should report them to your local authorities.
